

This presentation will cover the potential contribution that nuclear energy could have in the fulfilment of the goals associated with the energy transition. Considering future electricity mixes, synergies between low-carbon technologies that can be deployable in the short-term future seems like a reasonable pathway in order to meet the pressing timelines. In particular, the role of engineering in the development of advanced nuclear reactors will be discussed with an overview of challenges and opportunities.